Womb Chair

Eero Saarinen

Eero Saarinen designed the groundbreaking Womb Chair at Florence Knoll's request for "a chair that was like a basket full of pillows...something I could really curl up in." The fiberglass design supported multiple sitting postures and provided a comforting sense of security—hence the name. The Womb Chair was released in 1948 as a liberating counterpoint to the rigid Victorian-style chairs available at the time. Said Florence Knoll, "I told Eero I wanted a chair I could sit in sideways or any other way I want." The resulting design and its enveloping comfort were immediately popular and have remained so for 75 years.

With her typical modesty, Florence Knoll described her own line of desks as the “meat and potatoes” which had to be provided. “I did it because I needed the piece of furniture for a job and it wasn’t there, so I designed it.” While this may have been the motivation for the 1961 Table Desk, the result is anything but a fill-in piece. Perfectly proportioned and flawlessly detailed, the design embodies Florence Knoll’s adherence to the teachings of her favorite mentor, Mies van der Rohe.
